Excerpt: . . . he entered, but the attack ceased by the time he was admitted to the Base Hospital. In the second case the pulse-rate was too fast to count when the patient came in, and it was especially noted that the heart showed no murmurs. The following day, when the rate returned to normal, there were unmistakable signs of aortic regurgitation, on which account the patient was rejected from the army. This case illustrates the observation of Bard, that even the most pronounced of orificial murmurs are liable to disappear during an attack of paroxysmal tachycardia. Usually, however, as in the series of cases here reported, the soldier is taken with an attack after a short period of military service and remains under observation in the hospital. The medical literature, both French and English, especially during the last two years, presents a great deal of discussion...
